Campaign Finance Reform

January 17, 2014

JAN 17 2014

Hi Barbara,

WHATCOM COUNTY COUNCIL

Brunner

Once again, I would like to thank you for contacting me about this controversial topic.

I was at the Nov. 14, 2014 Whatcom County Council meeting and I am very sympathetic to the concerns of the numerous farmers and property owners about water rights.

As well I sense their anger towards the Washington Conservation Voters for "buying" the recent Whatcom County Council election.

To further validate the concerns of all of us about money buying elections, just look at privatizing liquor sales in Washington State. Costco "bought" that election with 22 million dollars.

The recent I-522 initiative on GMO's, the Grocery Manufacturers Association, GMA, "bought" that election. Defeating the initiative. That issue is being litigated now.

I have enclosed information on the Washington State House bill HJM 4001. The one opinion paper states, Washington State House to Congress: Get Big Money Out of Politics.

This bill was successfully passed 55 yeas and 42 nays.

Sadly, our two local representatives, Vincent Buys and Jason Overstreet voted against the bill.

I sense a disconnect between some of our elected officials and our needs. Make sure to mention this to your constituents.

On a separate issue regarding water rights. I was born and raised on Long Island, New York. As a former clam digger, I know all too well about the need for clean, available, water.

We are largely an extinct species because of over development and a disregard for wet lands.

If you are ever interested, I have quite a story to tell about the numerous mistakes that were made on Long Island, post WW2, with filling wet lands.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Regards,

Bob,

Washington State House to Congress: Get Big Money Out of Politics

Submitted by Peter Schurman on Fri, 03/08/2013 - 15:57

Update: This was a bi-partisan vote, with Republican Rep. Jan Angell joining Democrats in approving the resolution.

For Immediate Release March 8, 2013

Washington State House to Congress: Get Big Money Out of Politics

OLYMPIA, WA. - Last night, by a vote of 55-42, a resolution calling on Congress to overturn the Supreme Court's ruling in Citizens United by amending the U.S. Constitution to allow for regulation of money in politics (HJM 4001) passed the Washington State House of Representatives.

The vote puts Washington State on track to become the twelfth state to call for such a constitutional amendment to overturn Citizens United.

Oske Buckley, administrative director for Free Speech For People, which has been working in support of the resolution along with the WAMEND coalition, said: "More and more states are asking Congress to send them a constitutional amendment to get big money out of politics. We're proud that Washington has taken this bold step forward in the fight to reclaim our democracy."

HJM 4001 asks Congress to send a constitutional amendment to the states that would "return to the congress and the legislatures of the states the authority to regulate the size and timing of contributions to election campaigns, whether made to candidates or to ballot measures, and whether such contributions are made directly to campaigns or to groups making independent expenditures related to such campaigns, and the authority to require timely public disclosure of the source and amount of all such contributions."

The resolution was sponsored by Representatives Pedersen, Hope, Carlyle, Goodman, Kagi, Sells, Van De Wege, Haigh, Springer, Lytton, Tharinger, Jinkins, Hunt, Cody, Morrell, Ormsby, Hudgins, Pettigrew, Moeller, Upthegrove, Reykdal, Fitzgibbon, Ryu, Lias, Roberts, Maxwell, Sawyer, Riccelli, Farrell, Pollet, Moscoso, Santos, and Hansen.

Background

The movement to overturn Citizens United and reclaim our democracy has been growing across the country at the state and local levels. This past November, voters in both Montana and Colorado approved ballot measures by nearly three-to-one margins, and seven other states -- Hawaii, New Mexico, Vermont, Rhode Island, California, Massachusetts, and New Jersey -- acted through their legislatures, which passed resolutions calling for an amendment; in two more, Connecticut and Maryland, majorities of the legislatures signed letters to Congress calling for an amendment.

Congressman Jim McGovern introduced two such amendment bills this year. Both have been co-sponsored by Rep. Jim McDermott (D-WA) along with many other co-sponsors. HJ Res 20 would restore Congress' and the states' authority to regulate campaign spending, and HJ Res 21 or the "People's Rights Amendment" would overturn Citizens United and clarify that constitutional rights apply to living persons, not corporations.

Background:

This analysis was prepared by non-partisan legislative staff for the use of legislative members in their deliberations. This analysis is not a part of the legislation nor does it constitute a statement of legislative intent.

Over the past three decades, the Supreme Court of the United States (Supreme Court) has struck down several congressional campaign finance reform efforts on First Amendment grounds. In 1974 Congress amended the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 to limit the amount of money any individual could contribute to a political campaign, and to require public disclosure of all contributions over a certain amount. In the case of Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court upheld disclosure requirements and restrictions on individual contributions, but ruled that the government cannot cap the amount of personal money that an individual can spend on his or her own campaign. In the following decades, donations of "soft money" were increasingly used to circumvent campaign finance regulations, donations made not to a clearly identified candidate but instead to political parties for party building activities or issue advertisements.

Congress ultimately passed a bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (often denominated "McCain-Feingold," after its prime sponsors), which prohibited national political parties from spending soft money, prohibited groups associated with corporations and unions from spending money to advocate for or against candidates just before elections, and required candidates to appear in their advertisements and directly take credit for them. In 2010 in Citizens United v. the Federal Election Commission (Citizens United), the Supreme Court struck down large portions of this law. As a result, corporations and labor organizations are no longer subject to bans on independent spending and the use of general treasury funds for federal campaign advertising.

Since Citizens United, there has been a proliferation of super Political Action Committees (super PACs). Super PACs are restricted from coordinating with campaigns and limited in their ability to donate to campaigns directly, but may otherwise spend unlimited funds to advocate their agendas, by purchasing television advertising, for example. Corporations, unions, and other groups can contribute an unlimited amount of money to these outside organizations.

Although the Citizens United ruling did not directly affect existing state laws, the National Conference of State Legislatures reports that many states with laws limiting corporate and union spending in statewide campaigns responded to the ruling by repealing independent expenditure bans, either through legislative action or through a ruling by the Attorney General, Secretary of State, Elections Board, or Ethics Commission.

Summary of Bill:

The Legislature requests that Congress pass and send to the states for ratification a constitutional amendment returning the authority to regulate campaign financing to Congress and state legislatures.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Not requested.

Staff Summary of Public Testimony:

(In support) The Supreme Court has aggressively departed from tradition in how it is reading the First Amendment. As a consequence, there is mounting concern about the influence of money in politics and the ability of the people's voice to be heard. The best way to ensure that the ground rules work is to clarify, in the United States Constitution, that Congress and the states have the power to regulate and restrict the size of financial contributions to political candidates and ballot initiatives. Although a joint memorial like this is sometimes referred to as a letter to Santa Claus, this memorial can have an important effect on the political process.

Washington should make good on the promise of government of, by, and for the people. This is a nonpartisan issue uniting those who believe in liberty, opportunity, and representative self-government. Passage of this legislation is a necessary first step to ensuring the nation does not lose its promise as a representative republic. Allowing unlimited amounts of spending in elections creates an unequal balance of power between people and corporations. A corporation can flood elections in a town where the local government was attempting to adopt measures to curb abuses by that corporation. If corporations want to contribute money to political campaigns, they should be required to do so openly with full transparency.

This memorial would allow Washington to join others across the nation in demanding restoration of the state's prerogative in controlling the spending of money in elections. Citizens United indirectly provided support for the creation of Super PACs, allowing 501(c)(4) advocacy groups and corporations to spend much more money to influence elections. Spending tripled between the 2008 and 2012 general elections. Thirty-two Super PAC donors with an average contribution of $9.9 million matched all small voter contributions in the last general election. This favors anonymous donors over a well-informed electorate. Nonprofit groups spent big in 2012 and were able to hide their identity from the voters. "Dark money" sources paid for nearly 60 percent of all television advertising. People have travelled from clear across the state to support this measure. The public is extremely aware of the problem of "dark money" in politics, but people are cynical that their officials will not do anything about it. Many people surveyed about politicians report that politicians are corrupt because of the influence of money in politics. A ballot initiative filed in the city of Spokane last year garnered 40,000 signatures from people who are very unhappy about unlimited and largely unregulated campaign spending. This is part of a huge national movement. A multinational corporation that earns $20 billion across the world in a year can make tens of millions of dollars in hard money contributions, untold amounts in soft money contributions, and, through its might, avoid paying taxes. A corporation can influence the process through its employees and stockholders, who are individual people, but should not be able to draw upon the treasury of the corporation. In at least one state, more than half of the money spent in a state election race came from out-of-state. This undermines representational democracy.

(In support with concerns) The unequal political advantage that corporations have over the people, via the court's rulings interpreting the First Amendment, is not the only problem. The resolution fails to address the issue of corporate personhood. A constitutional amendment that also addresses corporate personhood, distinguishing between the rights of natural persons and the privileges of corporations, would not dismantle corporations, but would restore supervision by "We the People."

(Opposed) Money is not speech, and regulating money will not stop what is happening. Put regulations on the message that is going out, check it for accuracy, and check it for civility. This bill will not solve the problem.
